Course Description

In this composition course, students will study the principles of writing and analyzing non-fiction prose, focusing on argument and academic research strategies. As students, one should be able to write a literate and well-argued essay and should be able to read a literary text with some understanding and sensitivity. For practical purposes, this means that students should be able to write an effectively organized and substantial essay that is generally grammatically and syntactically sound and acquire the capacity to identify and discuss prose features. In English 102, students will acquire and polish the tools fundamental to effective writing and reading that will help them participate successfully in the discourse systems of the university and beyond.

Rationale of the course

The contents of Composition and Communication Skills have been selected and designed to develop students' abilities to think, organize, and express their ideas clearly and effectively in different genres of writing. Emphasis is particularly put on the various forms of essay writing such as descriptive, compare-contrast, and argumentative. Besides this, students will be given input on communicative aspects of English writing as a way of preparing them to meet the demands of professional writing. A term paper (a long critical essay/a small-scale research activity) is another requirement of the course that focuses mainly on argumentation and academic research strategies.

Course Objectives

The objective of the course is to-

1. Enable students to write organized and structured essays that are both grammatically and syntactically sound.
2. Facilitate the improvement of students' critical thinking, reading, and writing skills.
3. Develop students' skills to communicate effectively and professionally.
4. Improve inquiry-based learning system with an understanding of strategies of academic writing, emphasizing the importance of citation and referencing.
